Social media, including Facebook, Instagram, Threads, etc., has revolutionized the way we socialize and exchange information. Before the invention of social media, we relied on the telephone and letters to communicate. We read the newspaper and we watched the movie in theatre. The older media remain and some even prefer the traditional ways. However, with the invention of social media, we have instant access to each other and almost everything happening around the world from our digital devices. We can message each other or share photographs, idea, feelings, and information anytime and anywhere.

Suppose that one day the global telecommunication infrastructure is momentarily disrupted by a mega solar wind and we have no access to social media (without the telephone or the internet) over a significant period of time. In your opinion, what is going to happen with the loss of social media? What kind of social change can you envision? Do you think that the loss can actually help us develop a closer community with family and friends? Why and why not?
